Clann Mhór

The Virginia Blue Ridge Railroad Project

We received the following note from Pam Hardy on the May 14th IAS outing to Crozet VA, to the site of the Clann Mhór Project. I, for one, am so sad to have missed the trip and hope that this becomes an annual or at least regular event. All we Irish are in debt to the wonderful VA team working so hard to publicize this historic site. Keep up with the VA project at their website - <http://clannmhor.blogspot.com/>

Nancy, I just wanted to let you know Frank and I went with a total of about 9 IAS members to Crozet for the tunnel tour and the pub and music get together. The tour was amazing, too difficult to describe: the fog, the mist and the long dark tunnel at the end of a trail in the brush. With flashlights and real torches we went about 700 feet into the darkness. We saw the springs running into it and layers of locally kilned bricks from the 1850's, which had given away. The brickwork was amazing as well as seeing the spike marks in the granite made with men pounding the metal spikes and then using gunpowder to blast away a little bit of rock. This was before dynamite was invented. The food and music were good and we made good friends with the people from Albemarle and Augusta Counties. It was truly an amazing experience.

Sacred Ground: Clann Mhór asks that the proposed trail also honor the sad history behind it. This land is much more than a potential playground for outdoor enthusiasts. Our members tell me there is a special "feel" or aura to the tunnel as you walk through.

Father Duffy and the "Fighting Sixty-Ninth"

On June 26, 1932, Father Francis P. Duffy, the Chaplain for the "Fighting 69th" during World War I, died in New York City. Father Francis P. Duffy, pastor of Our Savior parish in the Bronx, was appointed chaplain of the 69th Infantry Regiment of the New York National Guard in 1914 he was already an old hand at being a military chaplain, having served as one in 1898 during the Spanish American War, although he never saw duty overseas during that brief conflict.

The Irish descended Duffy and the regiment were a good fit. Formed during the Civil War and part of the Irish Brigade, the 69th earned its "fighting" sobriquet, according to legend, when General Robert E. Lee at Fredericksburg, told that the 69th had made a gallant assault against the Confederate lines, and recalling the regiment from the Seven Days battles, stated "Ah yes - That fighting 69th."

The most celebrated U.S. Army chaplain in the Great War, Father Francis Patrick Duffy, a Roman Catholic priest, was born in Cobourg, Canada, and was ordained in 1896. He attended the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., and then was appointed professor of psychology and ethics at St. Joseph's Seminary in New York.

Father Duffy's career as an Army chaplain began with a brief tour of duty during the Spanish-American War when he was stationed at Montauk Point, Long Island. In 1912 he became pastor of Our Savior parish in the Bronx, and in 1914 he was appointed chaplain of the 69th Infantry Regiment of the New York National Guard. The "Fighting Sixty-Ninth," a basically Irish regiment, although containing members of other ethnic groups, had served with distinction during the Civil War. It was called up briefly during the Spanish-American War, and also in 1916, when it served on the Mexican border during General Pershing's Punitive expedition. When the US entered World War I, the regiment was renumbered the 165th Infantry and assembled at Camp Mills, New York. Assigned to be part of the new Rainbow (42nd) Division, its members continued to refer to the regiment by its traditional sobriquet.

Chaplain Duffy, by now a major and the senior chaplain of the 42nd Division, became an inspirational focus for the division and later for the A.E.F. The poet Joyce Kilmer writing about the voyage of the division across the Atlantic, observed that every day there could be seen a line of soldiers, "as long as the mess-line," waiting their turn to have Duffy hear their confessions. Every morning, Kilmer noted, a large crowd of soldiers would gather amidships on the transport where Chaplain Duffy would say Mass at an altar made from a long board resting on two nail kegs.

Arriving in France in November 1917, the division spent the winter training and in late February 1918, took over front-line trenches from French forces at Luneville in the Lorraine sector. At dawn on March 20, Duffy and the men of the 42nd received their first serious baptism of fire when a barrage of mustard gas shells burst among them. The bombardment lasted two days and there were over 400 casualties, the majority of them blinded.

For Chaplain Duffy, the next few months were to be filled with such scenes. He was most often found along the front lines hearing confessions and saying Mass, as well as visiting and counseling the soldiers. It was by his "ministry of presence" that he had his greatest influence and became an almost a legendary figure. Once the fighting began, he often traveled with a unit first-aid station, providing physical and spiritual care to the wounded and the dying. His presence on the battlefield was inspirational. Duffy was always near the heaviest fighting, exposing himself to constant danger as he moved from unit to unit.

His decorations included the Distinguished Service Cross and the Distinguished Service Medal. After the war, Duffy returned to a new parish in New York City. As pastor of the Holy Cross Church on 42nd Street, just off Broadway, the "actor's Church, Father Duffy added to his already great popularity. In 1919, he published a best selling book, Father Duffy's Story, chronicling his experience in the Great War. He died on 26 June 1932. In the 1940s movie The Fighting 69th, Father Duffy is portrayed by Pat O'Brien. (This is taken from the 69th's website)
